Introduction

Numerous case studies are presented that represent a wide assortment of approaches and instream treatments. Project goals also vary widely and, in some cases, these goals and objectives were not completely achieved. These case studies represent locations all over the United States in an attempt to represent some of the regionally sensitive challenges. Physical, chemical, and biological variations are expected. The authors of each case study are identified to allow the reader to follow up with an individual or organization if more information is needed. The opinions expressed are those of the authors.
